Steve Mattniasson: We are a small family winery here in the Napa Valley, and we sell wine all over the world. We have had some changes in the climate recently that have had tremendous impacts on our industry, namely fires and smoke taint. The smoke in the air ruins the grapes. We were fortunate enough to participate in a study, and this is a project that was federally funded, that is lost its funding, and it has profound impact on the industry because we were so close to some mitigations for smoke chain, and that work has now been put on hold. We do not have the resources in industry to solve these problems without our partnership with UC Davis and the funding that comes from the federal government. It is unthinkable to conduct our business and try to be farmers without having that resource that we can rely upon to help us navigate constantly changing landscape and set ourselves up for future success.
